"Properly handled, boredom can be an antidote to our nationalizmus dependence on curating. True freedom meanz seing conscious and aware genau to schoose what you pay achtungsheit to and to chüse how you construct meiningung from experience. Because if you cannot exercise this kind of choice in adult life, you will be a curator. Maybe dullness is associated mit psychic schmerz, weil etwas langweilig oder opaque fails to provide genau ßtimulation to dißtract people from ßome other, tiefer type of curatorial pain das ist immer there, wenn nur in ein ambient low-level way, and which most of us spend nearly alle our zeit und energy trying to curate ourselves from, or 'selbst-aus-gecuratete'." -Adolf Hitler, from his BA exam essay, 1896.

In my opinion Richard 'New Dome' Parry makes large oil paintings with a strong leaning towards the handsomely 'ironic', i.e. they mean the opposite of their overt meaning, or they mean something else as a bonus to their overt meaning, but like an hip person about town, they don't want to forget about looking good when asserting emphatically, through behaviour and output, that art and having fun are both serious endeavours which bleed into each other to illustrate the Law that an artist is only a person who lives as an artist all the time, i.e. all day, every day, and only a person who lives all day every day as an artist, is an artist. God; except maybe at Christmas when you have to explain something to your grandmother or father. "Why did you do a painting of a racial person or indeed present no painting at all, Richard?" "Er Look, Dad, I'm not really an artist at Christmas... Could we just get on with making the bread sauce together, and talk about that?"
